MY TURN
GOWRI YERRAMALLI

Passing the baton

meet. But whenever I pass by an upperclassmen, their faces are either zombie-like from sleep-deprivation or plastered to a glowing phone screen. There is no natural friendliness to be found anywhere in the way they carry themselves. Is this what we call "sophisticated and mature" behavior?

As we all journey through our four years of high school, we lose a lot of the zealous behavior and energy we once had as freshman. Our friendly, energetic mannerisms are replaced by lethargic behavior over the years. This may be due to our class involvement, homework overload, college applications and the many other things that come with the stress of high school, but mainly because of the precedent that our senior class sets for us.

As freshman, we entered high school with high standards and an eagerness to make the most of our raw start. We raised standards for ourselves and hoped to succeed like our role models, the seniors. But as we watched our role models start to slack off and develop "senioritis," so did we. We started to believe that maybe we could also find "the easy way" out of our work in high school. Our drive to succeed slowly diminished with each year, as we watched our seniors get increasingly sloppy with their effort and work ethic.

But this year as a senior, I hope that our senior class can reverse this long-held "tradition" for our freshmen. We have to realize that even though this may be our last year in high school, our actions are still being closely monitored and emulated by our juniors. We are their mentors and we can influence their futures and their legacies as seniors.

So let us be the role models that we are supposed to be for our underclassmen. Instead of just letting go of responsibilities, let us tap back into our freshman personalities and strive to obtain the goals we have been working so hard to reach since our first year in high school. Let us find the hunger and momentum we used to have to be successful, and the friendliness and eagerness we had to expand our prospects and communication networks.

If you are currently a senior, take note of the way a freshman is presenting himself next time you pass them in the hall. Learn from their energetic and friendly nature, and set a precedent that will guide them towards a focused and driven future. Be the senior example that you always wanted to see. So tap into your freshman personalities, because even though you may consider them "immature and childish," they can surely teach us a lot about ourselves.

There is something admirable about the freshman class. Even though they are the newbies and have had less experience than most, they possess qualities that we upperclassmen lack: attentiveness and being aware of our surroundings.

There's no question that there are significant differences between the way the freshman and upperclassmen carry themselves. Generally, we tend to associate the term "freshman" with immature and childlike behavior, and the term "upperclassmen" with sophisticated stature. But my four years in high school have proven this long-held stereotype to be wrong. For example, when I pass by a freshman in the hall, their heads are lifted from the ground and their faces ready with a genuine smile, eager to greet whomever they
