Concerning comments create commotion is sexually assaulted according to the Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network. During the span of just one debate, that's 45 people. This isn't just "locker room talk."

Bragging about sexual assault is inexcusable. By thinking you can do whatever you want because you are a star, you have added to the staggering number of sexual assault victims in the United States.

This is no longer about politics. It's about the continued abuse of women throughout history.

As evolved as we like to believe we are, prejudice and discrimination are still rampant in our society. Although you may not experience it, Mr. Trump, it's still there.

By making disparaging comments about the appearances of women that you don't like and boasting about harassing women, you not only admit that you contribute to the problem, you set a poor example for young men.

Boys look up to men that are powerful and influential. You are both. The malleable minds of my generation are shaped by what we are told. When the Republican nominee dismisses derogatory comments he once made, people begin to think that the comments are acceptable.

Sexual harassment should not be commonplace at work, as your son suggests. It is not a social norm. It is not just something people should just learn to live with. Its effects span further than just the attacker's damaged reputation.

Approximately 94 percent of women experience symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder within two weeks of being raped, and 30 percent of women still experience these symptoms nine months later (www.rainn.org). Women who have been raped are more likely to contemplate and attempt suicide or turn to drugs.

You can't do anything you want with women because you're famous, Mr. Trump. These are real people who experience the aftermath of the assault while you brag about it.

Whether every accuser is honest or not, your recorded words are available for anyone to listen. You can't backtrack. You can't deny it. As someone who claims to have the upmost respect for women, you have insulted your wife, ex-wives, daughters, granddaughters, voters, colleagues and every other woman. Your words mean nothing if your actions contradict it.

I think you can use this time to better yourself, Mr. Trump. Remember how you claimed your stardom allowed you to do whatever you want to women? Well it's this same stardom which makes everything you say relevant to the public. If you truly want to be president, you cannot continue to make offensive remarks. You could use your public platform to craft a meaningful apology for the mistakes you have made and work to rectify them.

You cannot change the person you were in the past. However, you can strive to become a better man now. Then maybe you can be deserving of the respect of the American people.
